The Fire, Weather & Avalanche Center is a non-profit organization that compiles information about natural disasters happening in the western half of the U.S. It provides services to local media and emergency services organizations to predict how weather patterns and other factors could affect how much a wildfire could grow and how safe an area is. Here is a link to a useful interactive map from the group.

Of course, California isn't the only part of the country where wildfires are causing destruction. There are approximately 60 wildfires across the country that are not currently contained, from Florida to Alaska. You can find more information about the wildfires that are currently happening in your state:
